Europe Turning to Tractors
Europe has its eye on tractor power as an aid to agricultural recovery.

The farm tractor was just getting into use in Europe during World War I and had a small part in the ensuing agricultural recovery in Europe. Nam Jany of the department of agriculture points out in an article in Foreign Agriculture which reveals with European agricultural recovery prospects that more tractor power is likely to be used in Europe.

"Since the First World War the tractor has been vastly improved," he notes, "and has acquired great importance throughout the world. The tractor was used, though only to a moderate extent, in continental Europe to lessen the decline in crop production during this war and will be used to speed up postwar recovery. Indeed, all European countries want to replace it, at least in part, by tractors and thus avoid the waiting until animals are bred and matured."

But 500 years ago, with similar climatic conditions, the people of Europe produced food by nature to create productive farms.

Oldest of these ancient Americans, says Haury, were members of the Woodland culture, who took houses on the foothill slopes of the White mountains.

Here they lived until between 800 and 600 A. D., when the Anasazi (Basket-makers) moved down from the north.

Civilization flourished, the population increased, and more ground was devoted to agriculture.

Two-story apartment houses were built and hundreds of rooms, dominated the city.

Then, in the 14th century, at the peak of the Anasazi culture, their flourishing system, elaborate irrigation system and great homes, were deserted. The reason is not known.

Underwater Sails
There are boats that have no masts but depend on sails under water to carry them along. They're called "mussel diggers" and ply along the Ohio and Kentucky rivers, collecting the fish from whose shells shirt buttons and cheap jewelry are made. The boats "dig" for the mussels with a trail, a long rod having two dozen or more hooks hanging from it. The trail is trailed behind the boat, and to contract the drag of its weight, a sheet of down-shade fashion over the bow. It sinks, fills with water and the river current "sails" boat and trail along downstream at just the speed required for "digging" mussels.
